

ANGELINA: AN UNAUTHORIZED BIOGRAPHY

Known for enigmatically-sourced celeb bios (Princess Diana, Tom Cruise), Andrew Morton now turns to Angelina Jolie. He unearths few bombshells but offers some odd revelations:

ANGELINA LIKES TO BARGAIN-SHOP “One day,” Morton writes, “she took [Nicolas] Cage . . . to a discount store, Pick ‘n Save . . . to remind him how the other half still lived.”

SHE'S A BOWLING HEIRESS, SORT OF Royalty might be overstating it, but Jolie's maternal grandparents co-owned a 10-lane bowling alley in suburban Chicago just as the craze for the pastime was beginning.

JOSEPHINE BAKER IS HER MODEL FOR MOTHERHOOD

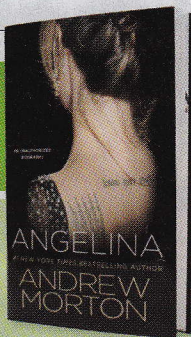

Morton claims that Jolie, a mom of six, gets “inspiration” from the expat nightclub performer who “raised twice as many orphans.”

PLAYING DRUMS “SAVED HER LIFE” So says her drum teacher Joey Covington of Jefferson Airplane. “They gave her a focus and a sense of achievement.”

NOVEL

If you've ever turned 50, or think you might, this deceptively bouncy, ultimately wrenching novel will grab you at page one. At a half-century, narrator Annabelle McKay revisits dashed dreams in a tale that jumps between 1977, when she and her husband fall in love, and 2005, when they fall out. While some plot turns, like a right-on-cue “chance” encounter, feel predictable, the phrase “summer read” seems invented for this debut.
